Human skin fibroblasts grown in culture were exposed for 6 hours to a dose of 0, 1, 2, 4, or 6 kJ/m<sup>2</sup> of UVB radiation. The cells were then labeled with [3H]proline for 24 hours and the collagen biosynthesis was determined. Exposure of the cells to UVB radiation resulted in a dose-dependent increase in the incorporation of [3H]proline into collagen. Collagen deposition by the cells was analyzed by an indirect immunofluorescence procedure with specific polyclonal and monoclonal antibodies to collagen. After 6 hours, the time of UVB exposure, the pattern of collagen deposition had changed in a dose-related manner, with increased numbers of cells staining positively. These results indicate that UVB radiation results in increased collagen biosynthesis and deposition by the cells in culture.Pebbles and
